

The Politics Of The School Curriculum: An Introduction

European Social Sciences Research Journal

Vol. 1, Issue 1, January 2013

CONCLUSIONS

The study concludes that several factors determine curriculum development in the Zimbabwean situation which include student demands, societal expectations, commerce and industry as future employers, politicians, government expectations, technological advancement, among others.

RECOMMENDATIONS

In the light of the above conclusions, the study recommends that curriculum development should be based mainly on the trends of globalization. Products of higher education should fit well in society and without the requisite skills and knowledge needed by the market, they will not survive. It is also important to base the curricula on the needs and expectations of the students. Curriculum designers should keep in mind that gone are the days when institutions of higher learning come and take what we offer but to say we offer what you want to take.
